Not illustrated. 1783 Excerpt: ...but a skill And nice discernment between good and ill. Her ends are honesty and public good, And without these she is not understood. Of two tilings however lie lias condescended to give proof. He very properly produces a young lady to prove that I am not a man: and a good old woman, my grandmother, to prove Mr. Oliver a fool. Poor old foul! she read her bible far otherwise than Junius,! she often found there that the sins of the fathers had been visited on the children; and therefore was cautious that herself and her immediate descendants should leave no reproach on her posterity: and they left none: how little could Ihe foresee thi; reverse of Junius, who visits my political ilm upon my grandmother! I do not charge this to the score of malice in him, it proceeded intirely from his propensity to blunder; that whilst he was reproaching me for introducing in the most harmless manner, the name of one female, he might himself at the same instant, introduce two. I Am represented alternately as it suits Juniuss purpose, under the opposite characters of a gloomy Monk, and a man of politeness and good humour. I am called a solitary Monks in order to confirm the notion given of me in Mr. Wilkess anonymous paragraphs, that I never laugh: and the terms of politeness and good humour on which I am said to have lived heretofore with the young lady, are intended to confirm other paragraphs of Mr, Wilkes, in in which lie is supposed to have offended m$ h y rcfujing his daughter. Ridiculous! Yet 1 cannot deny but that Junius has proved me unmanly and ungenerous as clearly as he has shewn me corrupt and vindictive: and I will tell him more; I have paid the present Mi nistry as many visits, and compliments as ever 1 paid to the young lad...
